Our next Newsmaker is Portland City Commissioner Nick Fish for public official of the year.

Commissioner Fish is the type of person you want on a city council. He's attentive, engaged and knowledgeable - and Instead of wearing his politics on his sleeves, he rolls them up, listens to his constituents and works to find realistic solutions to the issues we face.

Over his 11 years on the city council, Nick has played a major role overseeing the Bureau of Environmental Services and Portland Parks & Recreation. He was a driving force behind the Willamette River cleanup project. And if you spent anytime down by the river this past summer, you'll know that the work has paid off.

More recently, he was a major advocate of the Metro Housing Bond Campaign, which made available nearly $700 million for affordable housing in the metro area.

If you've seen a council meeting over the last few years, you know it's a thankless job. Yet, Commissioner Fish says it's a dream job and he's inspired every day by the work the council is doing and the community they represent.

Congratulations, Commissioner Fish.
